

A Closing Note and Appreciation from the Editor

For 25 years, Sacred Web has appeared in print form. The journal was founded in 1998 with the intention of sharing with its readers the wealth of the wisdom traditions and of their timeless relevance to modernity; hence, the subtitle 'A Journal of Tradition and Modernity.'

While it is no longer possible to sustain the journal in its present print format, the Editor intends to continue the original goals of the journal through a digital format. Efforts are therefore underway to enhance the content of the website at www.sacredweb.com to offer an archive of all 50 print volumes, new feature articles, reviews, artwork and poetry, as well as audio and videotaped content and a moderated forum for discussions by readers.

The Editor would like to thank all those who have enabled the journal to exist, including, of course, its various contributors.

In particular, the Editor wishes to express a debt of gratitude to the following:

- King Charles III who, as Prince of Wales, has supported the journal and has introduced both the Sacred Web Conferences
- Professor Seyyed Hossein Nasr, who has supported the journal from the outset, guided it, and offered keynote addresses at both the Conferences
- William Stoddart, Reza Shah-Kazemi, Wolfgang Smith, Huston Smith, Alvin Moore, Michael Fitzgerald, among the many friends of Sacred Web, who have guided it and contributed to it over the years

- Nigel Jackson, for his beautiful and symbolic cover illustrations that have graced the journal for many years
- The generous donors who have supported this enterprise
- Sam, Innis, and the staff at Samco, who have typeset and printed the journal, and Jon and Karim who have helped with the publication of the website
- Nazlin, not only for acting as the Conferences' organizer and generally assisting with the distribution of the journal, but for initially suggesting the idea which led to the journal's existence.

Last, but not least, a special appreciation is extended to you, the readers of Sacred Web, for justifying the journal's existence. We hope, God willing, to continue our engagement with you online.
